Joe Brandi was a college pastor of a nice, big church in Florida, making a nice salary, and living in a very nice house. One day, a friend who worked for World Orphans asked if he knew how many orphans there were in the world.

"A couple hundred thousand?" Joe answered, only able to give a guess.

"143 million," was the reply. Oh.

Joe was struck by the number of children who were parentless, but he wasn't going to take the bait that he knew his friend was casting. Things were going too good for him to let facts like 143 million orphans rip away his nice life to start caring for the world's orphans.

Some months later, he happened to see the movie Slumdog Millionaire. In it, a young girl is forced into prostitution. Joe's heart stirred. Though the character was fictional, he knew that the hell this little girl on screen was living was a reality for children around the world.

Soon after, Joe began a battle with cancer that started to challenge his entire value structure—his comfort, his material belongings, his security, his money. So what really is important in life?
